The chance always came after one or two men had been retired. The New Yorkers failed to get their first man on base in any inning.
Ray Keating, although reached for eight safeties by Cleveland, really deserved a smaller score for his ef-forts. Two of the three hits which the home team got for a run in the first inning were of the scratch variety, one bounding away from Pipp and another from Boone. Hagerman was generous to a fault, so much so that Bill Donovan shouted from the coaching line in the eighth inning after Rip had given his ninth pass of the afternoon: "And they say that I was wild, eh? How about this guy?" Hagerman spent the greater part of the afternoon trying in vain to locate the plate. In all he walked ten Yanks to first buse, but the golden opportunities faded one after another because Donovan's men could not hit the ball into

Fletcher and Meyers between them sloughed the game away. There was one thing about their misplays, they covered lots of ground. Fletcher committed a wild throw in the ninth wnien was responsible for the tring run, and in the eleventh Meyers led the second of the eleventh Meyers led the eleve in the eleventh Meyers had the passed-est passed ball of the springtime. The horsehide slid off his glove like a greased time, an hour and three-guarters by time-an hour and three-quarters by pigskin, and a Red rover came in from time—an hour and three-quarters by third. Fletcher had a mottled day with the watch. The Cubs won by an overtwo wild throws and a boot, and there whelming score, but that shed little was tangle foot fielding around the first bailiwick with Brainard and Killifer lead almost within its grasp. Many lead almost within its grasp. Many paw vainly for that habitat and allow teams have looked better in defeat than did Chicago in victory. Fletcher's waywardness began in the fourth inning when he fumbled on Griffith, the first man up. A fine play by Doyle nullified that. Larry made a running stop of Wagner's base hit and threw out Griffith, who was trying for third. Two hits were made off Stroud in the sixth, and with a man on third, another on first and one out, a fly from Olson was taken by Burns, who immediately threw out Twombly at the plate. It was a sweet throw and well handled the sixth but got running mistakes in the sixth, but got responsible to the sixth but got running mistakes in the sixth, but got responsible to the sixth but got running mistakes in the sixth, but got respectively. The eighth ironing was the only chapter in which the Yankees really had a chance to come abreast of the winners, despite the numerous passes that Hagerman was handing out. It was in this frame that Hagerman was especially generous, three passes being his contribution. Hughle High turned in one of the Yankee hits in this same inning and Walter Pipp, who in a previous inning had hit to left centre for a 'riple, foilowed High with a terrific smash to deep centre field. The drive bore all the earmarks of a home run, and as two Yanks were on the pashs at the time to the home fans emitted a huge groan. But Lebold dashed far back from where he had been playing and just managed to clutch the b.ii. The catch was made so deep in the outfield that Partzell had time to run back to second, cag the base after the catch and then make third.
